Breaking Ground

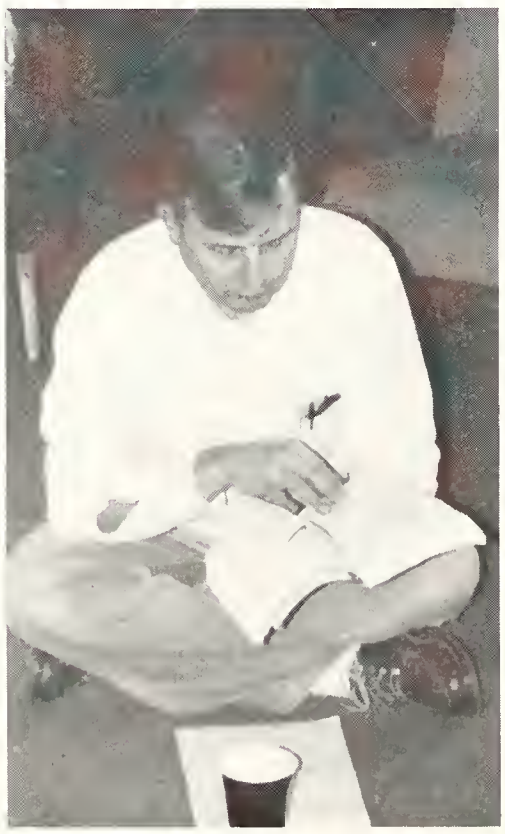
The toppling of a few trees in the fall of 1987 marked the ground breaking. Later, it spread to the upheavel of a parking lot, the disappearance of a familiar roadway and the emergence of various muddy paths. Thomas More College was under construction. Worksites both in front of and behind the college attested to the expanding horizons of the campus. From the windows of the Seiler Commons, students scrutinized the transfer of rolling hills into the Four Seasons country club. The area once designated for faculty parking was also subject to transformation upon establishment of the new Thomas More convocation center. Everywhere on the once scenic campus evidence of an area under physical construction could be found. Thus the 1987 fall semester, as well as the 1988 spring semester, were times of vast expansion for the TMC community.

FORD

Administrative Staff

Beyond the obvious construction on campus, other changes were underway. Administration welcomed a new Director of Community Relations, Dr. Elissa Plattner and Director of Student Life, Dr. Richard Herdlein. Many new faces joined the Thomas More community on all levels of college instruction. However, administrative construction was not solely limited to the introduction of new people. It also involved the transfer of venerable employees to new positions. Dr. Hebert, a long-standing member of the Thomas More faculty, became Dean of Students in the fall of 1987. Such changes attest to the intense effort involved in building a better administration.

The everchanging demands of academic achievement are nothing new for a college dedicated to teaching the "art of success". Students and faculty work together to uncover the hidden potential in every member of the community. The 1987-88 terms saw continued improvements in the field of academics under construction. As the demand for a liberal arts graduate continued, Thomas More sought to meet student needs with a revised core curriculum and the continued involvement of a dedicated staff.



Uncovering Success

Attitude Adjustments

Construction of a more subtle nature directly involves the students themselves. An important aspect of the college experience is the chance to form opinions and develop attitudes to last a lifetime. Every individual constructs a personal value system with each passing day. The Christian environment of the college provides an important catalyst for solid morals.

Social Structures

School spirit was mass produced by the active campus groups. Official clubs and spontaneous friends added life to the TMC social scene. From class oriented trips to established favorites, students broadened their horizons with the bold and the unusual. An education isn't complete without a foundational background in understanding human relationships. Interaction with new and different people is one of various valuable lessons at TMC.

Foundational Friendships

The closeknit community of Thomas More allows for the building and maintenance of incredible friendships. A smiling face could be found around every corner. Firm support was always available during times on shaky ground and bonds became that much stronger. The joys and sorrows of friendships under construction made classes more enjoyable and free time precious.

Constructing Careers

The most important construction involving students was evident in the area of careers under construction. The education received during a student's time at Thomas More lays the foundation for their entire lives. Whether the road ahead will be shaky and unsure or solid and secure is widely determined by their time spent in pursuit of goals. The years 1987 and 1988 were times when Thomas More laid considerable ground work in the development of a better institution and higher quality human beings.

CAMPUS LIFE

The success of Thomas More students is due largely to an understanding faculty and staff who are always willing to extend a hand of encouragement. Each department is enriched with the presence of caring individuals who make every student feel special. Without such dedicated personnel, there would be no Thomas More college. The faculty and staff are extremely generous with their free time and are easily accessible. Unfortunately, this yearbook could not depict all of Thomas More's hardworking employees for the 1987-88 terms. But those pictured are a fine example of this quality institution.

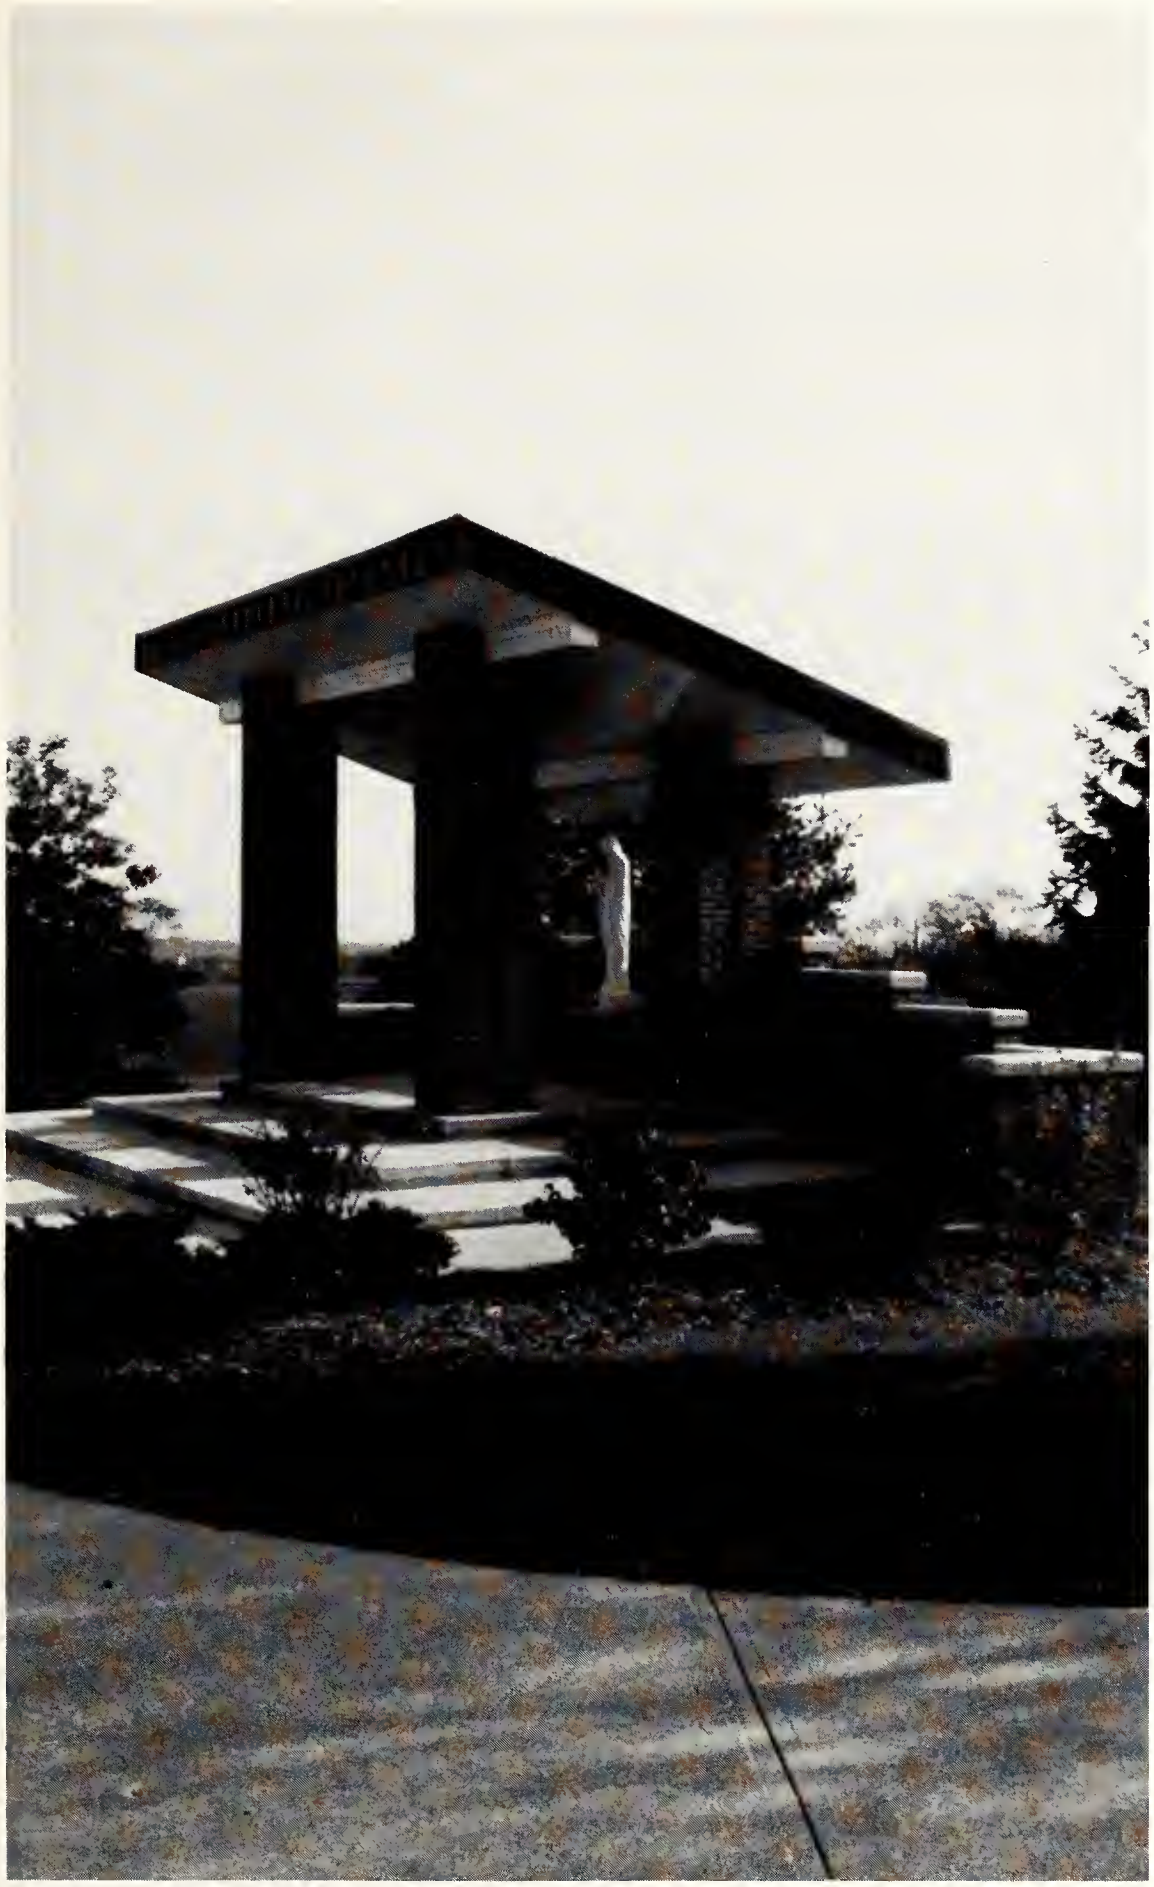
ORIENTATION
STAFF



From a shared secret between friends to class field trips, campus life at Thomas More encompasses many things. The previous pages show a variety of the daily activities as well as the special occasions of the '87-'88 years. Many changes took place at this time, including a newly reinstated yearbook. This year was the ground breaking and with continued labor the quality will improve. Even though all campus activities are not shown here, the generosity of several students and faculty made the remembrance of some activities possible.
